FINANCIAL LITERACY

What is Financial Independence?

We define financial independence as the point when you can sustain the lifestyle you want based on the wealth you have accumulated. In other words, the point when work becomes optional.

Financial Freedom!

Your journey to financial freedom requires financial planning.

And how do you do that when you don't even know what you spend on and how much you spend daily?

You simply need to track your spending and for completeness, your earnings as well.

The tracker could be manual in a notepad; or notes on your phone or excel spreadsheet on your iPad, laptop, any other device, apps, etcetera.

Your tracker should have two sides, one side showing what you spend on daily and the other what you earn daily.

If you're a salary earner, all you need do is divide your earnings by 30 days.

Don't forget to include your side hustles as well. Do that from the first day of the month and continue to the end of the month.

At the end of this exercise, it should be apparent where your money goes after earning. And that's 70 percent of your financial problems solved and you are well on your way to financial independence and subsequently financial freedom.

What is the difference between financial freedom and financial independence?

Financial independence means you have enough assets or income streams to cover your living expenses without needing to work. Financial freedom, on the other hand, is more about having the choice to live the life you want, regardless of whether you need to work.
